Nevertheless, the future of the region is still uncertain and the process of change has not begun to recuperate from the rapid pace of change it witnessed in 2011. The turmoil witnessed in the region did not necessarily come from the awakening, but it is a product of it. And the awakening cannot be reversed. It is still a slow but growing process. The Egyptian people refused to be pawns of the military dictatorship. The people decided to take responsibility for their own destiny. This is the lesson of the Egyptian uprising and the role that Egypt played. The Egyptian uprisings could have easily been crushed by the military regime, as the majority of the people preferred to keep their hands at their side, waiting for the army to return the country to its old condition, instead of reaching for their hands. This is because the military regime did not lack the power to crush the uprising; it had more than enough power, and the Egyptian people refused to rebel. Even if the military regime was aware that it could not suppress the uprising, the protesters did not hesitate to pursue their goals. They forced the military regime to engage in a media war; they had to deal with the sudden eruption of the army. They won the battle. They almost succeeded in staging a coup. The military rulers had to be aware that they would not be able to suppress the uprising, but they wanted to create the illusion that they could. In retrospect, the Arab uprisings were necessary. We had to pass through this in order to get to the current status, but the road has not been long or smooth. Despite the refusal of the Egyptian people to surrender to the regime, the lack of legitimacy is there in the process of change. The military regimes that arose in the aftermath of the Arab uprisings often lacked legitimacy. Regardless of their legitimacy, the military dictatorship seemed more stable and less challenging to the people than 82157476af
